

A person's home is the only place for a person to maintain their privacy and their peace. Unsolicited phone calls only serve to destroy both. No one has the right to enter the sanctity of another life. The constitution allows for a person to protect his home and those within. Disbanning the do-notcall is throwing that right away. Some say that the solitioris also have rights. I agree but it does not supersedes the right of the individual. That is the basic principle of the Constitution.

The FCC has been trying to curtail the use of inappropriate language on the airways. I applaud this. This, however, is the control of a media that is sought after, it is not an unsolicited communication. Yet, the FCC is considering the removal of protection from an unsolicited communique. This is reverse logic. The highest protection should be given to the means that are not sought after. Please do not disband the Constitution and its intent. Americans need something to believe in. Throwing away the Constitution does not allow for that.
